Mr Knapp had gone to the place do. They said he transacted business in yesterday, as he had gone almost dally for months, ever since the saloon was vacated by John Lawrence, who held the license, for the double purpose of removing bar glass and other fittings for which he probably had use in some other house or desired to sell, and to feed two cats that had been left behind when high license and impending prowhen high license and impending prohibition drove his tenant out of business. He was a familiar figure in the only slightly rented half of Mr. Knapp's old neighborhood of narrow streets and office, though he has not yet moved in dingy three and four story red brick houses.
